Back in 2013, the legendary Japanese animator and director Hayao Miyazaki formally announced he would retire and make no more feature-length films 【1】 (follow) the completion of The Wind Rises. Well, it turns out that you can't keep an Oscar-winning artist away from all 【2】 he loves. Miyazaki has revealed in a documentary 【3】 (air) on Japanese TV that he is now coming out of retirement to make a new animated feature.

【4】 the documentary, Miyazaki said that he was dissatisfied with the 12-minute CGI-animated film Boro the Caterpillar (《毛毛虫菠萝》) he was currently working on and would like to expand it into a feature-length film instead. The film could take up to four years to make, which means Miyazaki would be around 80 years old by the time it 【5】 (complete). If he sticks to his ideal timetable, it would be finished before the Tokyo Olympic Games.

Little is known about Boro the Caterpillar, other than 【6】 Miyazaki describes the film as “a story of a tiny, hairy caterpillar, so tiny that it 【7】 be easily squished (压坏) between your fingers.” And he has been working on the story for about two decades. The 12-minute Boro the Caterpillar will not be completed for about another year and 【8】 (screen) exclusively at the Ghibli Museum, a museum showcasing the work of Studio Ghibli, co-founded by Miyazaki.

【9】 he hasn't received a green light for the new film, Miyazaki is seen starting work on animation for the project. He plans to create storyboards (剧情梗概系列图) for about 100 cuts of footage. “I think it's still better 【10】 (die) when you are doing something than dying when you are doing nothing,” he said. This is Miyazaki—if he wants to make a film, it's going to get done undoubtedly. There's no way anyone would turn down another amazing piece of art from the legendary animator.

The Internet E-commerce and globalization are making a new economic age possible. In the future, capitalist markets will largely be replaced by a new kind of economic system based on 【1】 relationships, contractual arrangements and access rights.

Has the quality of our lives at work, at home and in our communities increased in direct proportion to all the new Internet and business-to-business Internet services being introduced into our lives? I have asked this question of hundreds of CEOs and corporate executives in Europe and the United States.

Surprisingly, virtually everyone has said, “No, quiet 【2】.” They say they are working longer hours, feel more stressed, are more impatient, and are even less civil in their dealings with colleagues and friends—not to mention strangers. And what's more revealing, they place much of the blame on the very same
