When Sophia was 2 years old, a butterfly landed on her. After that she was absorbed in insects. In addition to loving to read about insects and have her mom search information online about them to read to her. Sophia loves live ones. "If she keeps an insect, she always names it and will talk to them and kiss them." Spencer. Sophia's mom said "When she has one, she always makes sure to learn what it eats and what the best habitat for it is." Sophia's love for insects used to get her bullied(霸凌) by kids of her age.

Afraid that being called "strange" would cause Sophie to lose her enthusiasm, Spencer wrote a letter to a scientific society last year, explaining that her 8-year-old daughter loved to learn and explore the world of insects and asked if professional entomologist(昆虫学家) would be willing to speak to her over the phone or write her letter encouraging her in her dreams.

After an outpouring of love and support from the scientific community online, she has a newfound confidence in her scientific interest- along with her first byline(署名) in a scientific journal. Last August, the Society posted the letter online, writing, "A young girl who loves insects is being bullied needs our support". In response, entomologists from all over the world reached out in support of Sophia and offering their time and resources.

Besides, Sophia took lessons from Morgan, an entomology Ph.D." Last week she caught a fly and it had babies. Morgan called her to walk her through the process of raising the young insects, which she plans to set free after they are adults. We are now proud of the owner of over a 100 babies in an insect container. She feeds them food every day and is attracted by the rapid development that is happening," she added.
