The David J. Sencer CDC Museum uses award-winning exhibits and programs to educate visitors about the value of public health, and present vast accomplishments of CDC (Centers for Disease Control and Prevention). The museum hosts about 90,000 visitors each year, and provides popular educational programs for students and teachers.

Originally called the Global Health Odyssey Museum, it was set up in 1996 alongside CDC's 50th anniversary. In 2011, the museum was renamed the David J. Sencer CDC Museum, in honor of the longest serving director of CDC.

Strategic Objectives (目标)

- Support CDC's duty to prevent disease, injuries and disability and to encourage healthy lifestyles through all stages of life.
- Inform and educate people about public health, displaying its connection with their lives.
- Educate middle and high school students and families about epidemiology(流行病学) and the science of public health; encourage young people to consider careers in the field of public health.
- Make the case for CDC's commitment to participate in global solutions to international public health challenges.
